In "The Price of Flowers" by Prabhat Kumar Mukhopadhyay, the element of superstition is introduced through the character of Mrs. Clifford and her belief in a magical crystal ring. This element is significant in the story as it drives certain events and emotions. Here's how superstition is introduced:

The introduction of superstition occurs when Mrs. Clifford, Maggie's mother, becomes anxious and desperate for news about her son, Frank, who is serving as a soldier on the Northwest Frontier in India. With no communication from Frank for an extended period, Mrs. Clifford becomes deeply worried about his safety and well-being. In her distress, she clings to a belief in the magical properties of a crystal ring that her son, Frank, had received from a yogi in India.

Mrs. Clifford believes that if someone gazes into the crystal ring with concentrated focus, they will be able to see a vision of a distant person and what they are doing. She hopes that this magical ring can provide her with some information about Frank's condition. This belief in the crystal's powers introduces the element of superstition into the story, as it is based on a mystical and unproven belief rather than rational evidence.

The element of superstition continues to play a role as Maggie and Mrs. Clifford implore the narrator, Mr. Gupta, who is Indian, to look into the crystal ring and provide them with a vision of Frank's well-being. Mr. Gupta, aware of the ring's true nature, ultimately decides to pretend to see a positive outcome in the crystal, providing the desperate mother and daughter with a false sense of hope.

The ring was a symbol of their familial connection and love. It was not just an ordinary piece of jewellery; it was a tangible link to her beloved son, who was far away in a distant and potentially dangerous place. Given the uncertainties and anxieties associated with her son's military service in a foreign land, the ring provided Mrs. Clifford with a sense of comfort and hope. She clung to the belief that the ring had mystical powers, which could potentially offer her a glimpse into Frank's well-being and safety, easing her deep concerns and worries.

The ring also represented a source of solace and emotional support for Mrs. Clifford during her son's absence. It served as a reminder of Frank's love and thoughtfulness, as he had received it from a yogi in India and sent it to his family. In times of distress and uncertainty, people often cling to objects that hold sentimental value, and the crystal ring was one such cherished item for Mrs. Clifford. This act underscores the complex interplay between faith, compassion, and the desire to alleviate someone's suffering, even if it involves a temporary suspension of truth.
